Demographic

According to Patrick Elzriere, who is part of Gayvox (gayvox.fr), the organization that now owns the Gai Pied publishing group, Gai Pied magazine was never meant to be specifically for gays and lesbians, or for a mixed audience, but rather for anyone who felt constrained by artificial barriers.

However, an analysis of the contents of Gai Pied reveal that the magazine was marketed primarily towards a young, affluent, and white gay male audience. Although this magazine was also distributed in North America and parts of Africa, many of the articles are explicitly written for a European audience. Although one could assume this magazine was also read by many people of colour, women and other gender minorities, poor or working-class people, older people, transgender people, people with disabilities, and people belonging to other minority groups who are frequently underrepresented in mainstream queer discourse, this readership is not reflected in the contents of the magazine.

Background Information

Gai Pied was a gay lifestyle magazine published in France and distributed throughout the French Diaspora between 1979 and 1992, first running monthly until March 1980, then weekly thereafter. It was founded by prominent political activist and journalist Jean Le Bitoux to increase the political consciousness of homosexuals as a group. Throughout its run it was sold in France, Belgium, The Netherlands, Switzerland, Canada, The United States, Great Britain, Spain, The Ivory Coast and Sweden.

The title of the Magazine literally means gay foot and is an “untranslatable pun devised by the philosopher Michel Foucault” (Sibalis, 2000, p. 238).

When the magazine began, it was very politically radical in tone, but as it became commercially successful, this gradually changed.

Gai Pied is credited with being one of the first queer publications to achieve financial success and relative acceptance by mainstream distributors, as well as being one of the first media sources to conceive of a gay lifestyle that could be seen as appealing to young, affluent and newly-out queer consumers. However, this newly promoted image created tension within the magazine’s staff and Le Bitoux resigned in 1983, because he disagreed with the new political stance of the magazine. Le Bitoux asserted that a focus on consumerism and entertainment would cause readers to become un-critical of the social position of homosexuals within society.

Earlier editions of Gai Pied featured primarily articles on political issues, and later editions contained a mix of “serious” articles (dealing with topics such as AIDS, legal and employment discrimination, censorship of queer media, etc.) with articles about fashion, vacationing, casual sex and pornographic photos.

Contents by Topic

Connections to Other Publications

The Gai Pied group also published a number of other magazines including Paris Capitale, Gay Pravda, Collector, Café and e.m@le as well as a number of city guides informing readers of where they can find gay-friendly establishments and other attractions of interest.
